In an article published by the New York Times by “The Learning Network”, this was used to prompt users to answer a survey about where they made friends. It’s a bar graph that depicts that in regard to income, the locations where people made friends. What I like about the graph is that it is separated by location and hints that income may have something to do where people made friends but what I don’t like is that there are no clear “definition” for average because there is no clear value indicating how much the average is.
